SUBJECT: Primer on Transfer Taxes

1. Overview of Federal Transfer Tax System

The federal government imposes a tax on certain transfers made during life (gift tax) or at death (estate tax); and it assesses an additional tax on certain transfers made to or for the benefit of persons two or more generations below that of the transferor (generation-skipping transfer tax). There are common elements in these three tax regimes which we will summarize here. More specific information about each tax will be provided in the following three sections. The common elements are:

- a. Marital Deduction.<sup>1</sup> No transfer tax is imposed on transfers to your spouse. Transfers qualifying for the marital deduction can be made directly to your spouse or to a qualifying trust for his or her benefit. A qualifying trust must distribute all of its net ordinary income to the spouse at least annually; and the trust must be prohibited from making any distribution to any beneficiary other than the spouse during his or her lifetime. You may (but need not) give your spouse a power of appointment to direct in his or her Will where the balance of the trust is to be distributed following your spouse's death. Many clients opt to provide their spouse with such a power, which is often restricted to benefiting descendants only, or some other defined group of permitted beneficiaries.
- b. Charitable Deduction. No transfer tax is imposed on transfers to qualifying charities, i.e. charities recognized as tax-exempt by the IRS. This includes direct transfers to such charitable organizations, including charitable foundations and donor-advised funds at public foundations like the Maine Community Foundation. It also includes the "charitable portion" of certain trusts or other arrangements which involve both charitable and non-charitable beneficiaries, such as charitable remainder trusts, charitable lead trusts, and charitable gift annuities.

<sup>1</sup> The provisions described in this section assume your spouse is a US citizen. If that is not the case, then different and more restrictive rules will apply. See Section 5 below.

- c. Exemptions from Tax. Transfers which do not qualify for a marital deduction or charitable deduction may be subject to a federal transfer tax, but only when the aggregate amount of such transfers exceeds an applicable exemption. The American Taxpayer Relief Act of 2012 (“ATRA”) was enacted on January 2, 2013 to avoid the expiration of tax cuts under 2010 legislation, a scenario commonly known as the “fiscal cliff.” Under this legislation, the exemptions available with regard to the gift tax, estate tax and generation-skipping transfer tax are now all the same. More recently, the Tax Cuts and Jobs Act of 2017 (TCJA) doubled the taxable threshold, which is now set statutorily at $10 million but indexed for inflation. The exemption is $11.18 million. Specific information about these various exemptions is set forth in the next three sections of this memorandum.

2. Federal Gift Tax

Some transfers are not treated as gifts for federal transfer tax purposes, and others are treated as gifts but do not have to be reported. The first category consists of tuition payments made directly to a school, and medical expenses paid directly to a provider, for the benefit of another person. The second category includes so-called “annual exclusion gifts.” These are present-interest gifts made to individuals (or to certain trusts<sup>2</sup>) which have a value less than the annual exclusion amount in the year of the gift. Gifts not covered by the annual exclusion amount are called “taxable gifts” and are offset by the transferor’s lifetime gift tax exemption on a cumulative basis over the years. Once your entire lifetime exemption has been so utilized, all taxable gifts thereafter will result in a gift tax. More details on these various concepts are set forth below.

- a. Annual Exclusion and Gift Splitting. For many years the gift tax annual exclusion was fixed at $10,000. Now that it is being adjusted from time to time for inflation, the current annual exclusion amount for gifts made in 2018 is $ 15,000 per recipient. In other words, you can transfer property worth up to $15,000 per year per recipient and not have to report those gifts to the IRS. If your spouse signs an appropriate consent, you can also use your spouse’s annual exclusion and therefore give up to $30,000 per recipient without making a taxable gift; however, this does require your filing a gift tax return with the IRS, because that is the form on which your spouse would be confirming his or her consent. This is called “gift splitting” and, if it is done, it must apply to all gifts you are making to persons other than your spouse during the year in question.

An example may be helpful. If John gives his daughter property worth $230,000 in 2018, the first $15,000 is covered by his annual exclusion and the remaining $215,000 is a taxable gift reportable on a gift tax return. That taxable gift will reduce John’s lifetime exemption (see Section b below) by $215,000; but no gift tax will be due unless John’s remaining exemption going into 2018 was less than $215,000. If John’s wife agrees to gift splitting and signs the consent portion of his gift tax return, then she will be treated as having made half of the gift even though the entire gift came from John. Accordingly,

<sup>2</sup> Only “present interest” gifts qualify for the annual exclusion. These are gifts made directly to a recipient and over which he has immediate control. Accordingly, most gifts to trusts do not qualify for the annual exclusion. There are limited exceptions, however, for certain trusts which have special tax-sensitive provisions, including so-called Crummey trusts.

$30,000 of the total gift would be sheltered by their respective annual exclusions, the remaining $200,000 would be treated as a taxable gift of $100,000 made by each of them, and their respective lifetime exemptions would each be reduced by that $100,000 amount. A gift tax return that consents to gift splitting must split all gifts reported and the Donor/Spouse cannot choose which gifts to split.

- b. Lifetime Exemption and Tax Rate. The lifetime gift exemption had been $1 million per transferor for many years, then increased under ATRA, and most recently doubled under TJCA to its current amount of $11.18 million (for 2018). Each taxpayer's gift tax exemption is "used up" on a cumulative basis over his lifetime to shelter "taxable gifts" from any gift tax liability. Once the exemption has been fully utilized, all further taxable gifts will generate a gift tax at a flat rate of 40% as of 2013 and going forward. One last point about the gift tax exemption: whenever a taxpayer makes a "taxable gift" and uses up some of his lifetime gift tax exemption, he is also in effect reducing his estate tax exemption by the same amount. In other words, John's $100,000 taxable gift to his daughter in 2018 will reduce both his gift tax exemption and his estate tax exemption by $100,000. As the exemption increases with indexing, clients may be able to make taxable gifts that top off earlier gifts that fully utilized previous exemptions.

3. Federal Estate Tax

Transfers at death which do not qualify for the marital deduction or charitable deduction are subject to a federal estate tax on the aggregate amount which exceeds the exemption available in the year of death. Under TJCA, the estate tax exemption for 2018 after indexing is $11.18 million per decedent and the maximum tax rate on the amount over that exemption is 40%.

Prior to ATRA, a very common estate planning problem involved married couples whose total combined estate value exceeded the amount of a single available estate tax exemption. This meant that each spouse would have to separately own enough property so each could use a trust to hold assets with a total value equal to his or her available estate tax exemption to avoid or at least reduce the estate tax liability on the overall estate. For example, if George and Martha had a combined estate worth about $15 million, and if the available exemption for each were $11.18 million, it would not make tax sense for the first to die to leave everything outright to the surviving spouse, because that surviving spouse would then have a $15 million estate, which would likely be more than his or her available estate tax exemption; and thus a federal estate tax would be due when that surviving spouse later died. It would have been better if the spouses had divided their total estate so that each owned about half, and each could bequeath his or her half to a trust for the surviving spouse which would not be counted as part of that survivor's estate. These trusts are commonly called "Family Trusts" or "Credit Shelter Trusts." For example, if Martha had died first and left the lesser of her entire estate or that portion covered by her estate tax exemption to a trust for George which is not qualified for the marital deduction, that bequest would be tax free because of Martha's exemption. When George died later, his own estate (which would not include the trust Martha had established for him) would not be subject to the estate tax except to the extent that its value exceeded his available estate tax exemption in the year of death. As a result, this couple's entire $15 million estate could pass at the second death to the couple's descendants with no federal estate tax to be paid.

Effective in 2013, ATRA permanently extended a “portability” provision which allows the estate of a surviving spouse to utilize the unused estate tax exemption of a pre-deceased spouse to shelter additional assets over the exemption amount from estate taxation at the second death. If a federal estate tax return is filed for the estate of the first spouse to die, electing to pass his or her unused exemption to the surviving spouse, the surviving spouse may use the exemption and essentially “add” it to his or her own exemption. There are a few complex rules that pertain to portability, and if the surviving spouse turns out to have different beneficiaries from the first spouse to die, the surviving spouse’s estate might use the exemption of the first to die to “cover” his or her own assets that pass to his or her own beneficiaries and thus the beneficiaries of the first to die could, in certain circumstances, pay tax that would otherwise have been avoided if the first to die had used his or her own exemption with a traditional trust plan. Thus, portability, while offering a simple solution for some plans, does not fit all circumstances and must be used intentionally and with caution. This portability provision does not apply to the generation-skipping transfer tax or to the Maine estate tax, so it may have limited utility for many couples who are Maine residents even though the provision is now permanent.

4. Generation-Skipping Transfer Tax

The Generation-Skipping Transfer Tax (GSTT) was enacted by Congress in 1976, and substantially revised in 1986, to eliminate a perceived loophole in the federal transfer tax system: the ability of very wealthy families to avoid estate taxes by utilizing multi-generational dynasty trusts. These generation-skipping trusts would typically provide for the transferor’s children as the primary beneficiaries initially, but would also provide for subsequent generations of descendants before terminating pursuant to applicable state law under the so-called Rule Against Perpetuities. This meant that estate taxes could be avoided at each child’s death, and each grandchild’s death, etc., because those later decedents would not be owners of any portion of the continuing trust.

The GSTT is a surtax assessed on generation-skipping transfers in addition to any gift tax or estate tax payable by a transferor or his estate on account of a given transfer. The rate of this tax is equal to the highest estate tax rate then in effect. Thus, after subtracting a 40% gift or estate tax from the value of the transferred property, the balance is taxed again at a 40% rate. The 2018 exemption applicable to the GSTT is $11.18 million, the same as for both gift taxes and estate taxes.

Given the draconian nature of the GSTT, most generation-skipping tax planning involves the utilization of each transferor’s full GSTT exemption to fund one or more generation-skipping trusts and limiting such arrangements to the exemption amount so that no GSTT will have to be paid. Under current law, this allows a married couple to set aside up to $22.36 million in generation-skipping arrangements without incurring any GSTT. The specific elements of the GSTT are extremely complicated and require very careful planning to avoid the imposition of this surtax when generation-skipping arrangements are desired.

5. Special Rules for Non-Citizen Spouses

The unlimited marital deduction discussed at the beginning of this memorandum does not apply to transfers made to a non-citizen spouse. Transfers to such a spouse, whether made during one’s lifetime or at death, are subject to the following special rules:

- a. Gift Tax. Gifts totaling up to $152,000 per year can be made to a non-citizen spouse in 2018 under a limited marital deduction provision. Gifts to such a spouse in excess of that amount will be “taxable gifts” which can be offset by the transferor’s lifetime gift tax exemption. This threshold amount is also indexed and changes annually and enables an additional gift each year.
- b. Estate Tax. Death-time transfers to a non-citizen spouse (including life insurance and qualified plan/IRA benefits) can qualify for an unlimited marital deduction only to the extent such transfers are made to a Qualified Domestic Trust (QDOT) which satisfies various requirements set forth in the Internal Revenue Code. Transfers made directly to the non-citizen spouse (including joint property passing by survivorship), or to a trust which does not qualify as a QDOT, are subject to estate taxation but can be offset by the transferor’s federal estate tax exemption.
- c. QDOT Impact. One key feature of a QDOT which can create estate tax problems for a couple is that all principal distributions made from such a trust during the remaining lifetime of the surviving spouse (other than certain defined hardship distributions) are treated as transfers from the original transferor’s estate and are subject to estate tax payable by the QDOT. Upon the later death of the surviving spouse, when the trust assets are distributed to other beneficiaries, such distributions are treated as having been made from the estate of the original transferor and, again, are subject to an estate tax payable by the QDOT. In other words, no part of the estate tax exemption available to the non-citizen surviving spouse can be used to shelter the principal in a QDOT from an estate tax assessed in connection with the estate of the U.S. citizen transferor.

A surviving spouse who is not a U.S. citizen on the date of death of his or her spouse may avoid the need for a QDOT, and may qualify for an unlimited marital deduction as a U.S. citizen, if he or she becomes a citizen by the time the deceased spouse’s estate tax return is timely filed. Since every estate is entitled to an automatic 6-month extension beyond the 9-month due date for filing estate tax returns, this gives the surviving spouse up to 15 months to become a U.S. citizen.

6. No Maine Gift Tax, but ...

Maine does not have a gift tax. This means that, for the most part, gifts made during one’s lifetime will escape the Maine estate tax at death. However, Maine includes taxable gifts (i.e. those not covered by one’s annual exclusions) made within 12 months of death in the transferor’s estate for Maine estate tax purposes.

The absence of a state-level gift tax in Maine can tip the scales in favor of making lifetime taxable gifts, notwithstanding the potential income tax cost down the road of doing so. The major “downside” of making such gifts is that the recipient of the gift succeeds to the transferor’s cost basis in the gifted property. Any capital gain realized on the later sale of that property will generate an income tax liability. Conversely, assets inherited from a decedent receive a basis adjustment at death. The new cost basis is the fair market value of the property as of the decedent’s date of death. As a result, the sale of inherited property shortly after a decedent’s death should generate little if any capital gain. This significant difference in the treatment of basis for property received by inheritance rather than by gift is an important factor to be weighed in determining whether or not to make “taxable gifts” particularly by persons whose estates are not likely to be subject to the federal estate tax. But for persons seeking to reduce or even eliminate a Maine estate tax liability, the making of such taxable gifts may be advisable, so long as there is a strong likelihood the transferor will outlive such gifts by more than a year.

7. Maine Estate Tax

The Maine estate tax system has undergone a series of fairly significant changes over the past decade, culminating in a complete overhaul which became effective on January 1, 2016. Maine does not recognize portability, and thus couples with large estates may well require trust tax planning, but couples with estates comfortably under the Maine and federal exemption amounts may now have simplified estate plans without the need for tax motivated trusts.

Beginning in 2016, Maine’s estate tax statute includes a true exemption and new tax rates, with the exemption level increasing from $2 million to equal the then existing federal exemption amount (excluding, however, portability). The tax rates for decedents who die in 2017 are as follows: 8% for estates with assets over $5.49 million and up to $8.49 million; 10% for additional assets between $8.49 million and $11.49 million; and 12% on amounts in excess of $11.49 million. The Maine estate tax exemption for 2018 is $5.6 million. These changes do not affect the pass-through entity rules described below. In addition, although gifts made within one year of death are still added back to the estate of decedents, completed gifts made earlier than one year before death are no longer included in the taxable estate.

It is important for nonresidents who own Maine property to understand that Maine has a special rule when real estate or tangible personal property is held in a pass-through entity which is run as an active business for profit. In such situations, the pass-through entity will be recognized and taxed as an intangible asset by the state of the nonresident’s domicile (and not by Maine). When Maine property is held in a pass-through entity that is not run as an active business for profit (ownership of a vacation home, for instance), Maine will disregard the entity and impose an estate tax on the nonresident’s estate based on the proportion that the value of the Maine property comprises of the decedent’s entire estate. The critical distinction for nonresidents is between personal use property (taxable) and business property (not taxable) held in a pass-through entity.

The Maine estate tax structure also applies to nonresident estates. Once the initial tax is calculated under the new system, the initial tax is multiplied by the Maine property fraction to arrive at a final tax liability for nonresident estates.
